The student should be able to:
- Determine under what conditions CRM systems is a valuable tool in penetrating markets
- Understand how to build a CRM system and the consequences of relying on CRM techniques
- Understand the role of cognition in determining customer behaviour
- Practically be able to use the knowledge about cognitive processes in enhancing marketing efforts
- Develop a corporate brand marketing campaign in order to improve corporate image
- Understand the difference between product brands, corporate brands and corporate identity
- Evaluate the difference in using alternate marketing channels for developing customer relationships
- Understand the impact of internet marketing on the development of customer relationships

Course contents

The course is based on four different aspects of marketing:
- Customer relationship management (CRM) systems
Customer relationship management refers to modern quantitative techniques of tracking mass market customer (consumer) behavior and need. CRM and similar techniques are used to minitor market penetration, measure customer satisfaction and to develop mass market products
- Marketing psychology
Marketing psychology refers to processes by which mass market customers (consumers) form cognitive beliefs and attachements to products and brands. Marketing psychology forms a basis for mass marketing campaigns, but is also related to the development of brands
- Corporate branding and corporate identity
Corporate branding and corporate identity refers to the branding process by which organizations differentiate from other actors within a given field. Corporate branding is a deliberate attempt to influence customer into perceiving a given product or organization relative to other organizations. Branding and identity are interrelated and both form an important part in marketing strategies.
- Marketing channels, including internet-marketing
Marketing channel refers to the delivery of products through internet, branch network, relationship or other mechanisms. A particular emphasis will be placed on the increased role of internet-marketing. Marketing channel research concerns how organizations interrelate with customers, but also suppliers in a given industry. The technological advancements made in internet makes i possible to form new strategies by which marketers can communicate with customers.
