Intended learning outcomes

After passing the course, the student should be able to:

- plan and give convincing presentations adapted to digital rhetorical situations and the preconditions of the digital environment
- reflect on one's own and others' use of different measures of influence and its consequences for the possibilities of the audience to understand the message.

Course contents

The course focuses on the practical skills in giving convincing and professional presentations in digital environments. The course also brings up important rhetorical concepts for efficient message transfer and the possibilities and challenges of the digital environment, with regard to creating commitment of and interaction with the audience. This includes for example planning and design of visual aids and the importance of non-verbal signals' to streamline the message transfer.

Examination

- LEXA - Ongoing exams, 1.5 credits, grading scale: P, F

Based on recommendation from KTH's coordinator for disabilities, the examiner will decide how to adapt an examination for students with documented disability.

The examiner may apply another examination format when re-examining individual students.

If the course is discontinued, students may request to be examined during the following two academic years.
